Yeah, they really ought to redesign the SAT. It's just not practical to use anymore. I think the new ISAT replaces the ACT. But what about the SAT? I would like to see that the test be changed to a "multiple-choice test" with actual questions. I don't care if it's sitting, standing, or jumping, I'm going to give it my best shot. I would also like to see the elimination of the essay section. I'm sure that those trying to cheat are going to try anyway, but having an essay section encourages people who aren't good at this type of test to get into the school system. Thursday, April 4, 2012 I've been kind of doing my best to step away from politics. I think that sometimes I just need to have a break from it. Unfortunately, today is the day that political ads started popping up on TV. One of them, I believe, is from Obama, which is kind of ironic. The ad is talking about how Romney tried to discriminate against the poor and then they showed the footage of Mitt Romney standing behind Obama at the signing ceremony for Obamacare. Now, don't get me wrong, I'm not really supporting Obama. However, I think that Romney is a terrible candidate for president. I'm worried about the country. However, the ad that I want to talk about is the one from Newt Gingrich. They are trying to paint Gingrich as a crazy conservative. In it, they showed clips of Newt Gingrich being interviewed about children being shot, going to a high school prom, and other things. They followed that up with clips of Newt Gingrich making some crazy, seemingly out of place statements, including that the women who were harassed by Bill Clinton should have the right to demand that Bill Clinton apologize. However, what I want to focus on is the last part of the ad. The clip of Newt Gingrich walking into his house and "embracing" Bill Clinton. Of course, it should have been more than just that. In that clip, I believe that Gingrich makes a comment about "looking back in anger." He also said that he didn't say anything "mean." I think that one of the biggest problems with the current presidential race is that the people who are running for office don't seem to be looking back. They are sitting around and living in the past. They are so busy trying to point out the faults of the current incumbent that they have forgotten what they said or did 82157476af
